Madhumita Murgia talks to Kathryn Parsons about her work in promoting digital literacy through a company she co-founded, Decoded, which aims to teach people to encode for the day. There's so much you need to do business: great idea, access to capital, industrial knowledge, passion. Should there be coding on this list? Programming skills were high on the wish list of budding entrepreneurs at the recent SXSW Interactive festival in Austin, Texas. One reason: Investors seem to like it by the coding-know. During a Q&A portion of the panel called Investor Spotting, I witnessed one investor interrupt an entrepreneur who was trying to pitch his startup idea. Are you coding? asked. Big break. No, said the businessman, dejectedly. I wish. The market for online classes and night-school courses in programming is hot, according to the New York Times. A number of startups - including the touted Codeacademy - are catering to this new crop of kodera wannabes, the paper reports. The thinking is that with so much business pulling toward the internet, it's important for today's entrepreneurs to learn the language of computers - or at least enough that they won't be left behind. Of course, programming skills aren't everything - and budding entrepreneurs who don't have them are getting to hire IT staff (if budget allows) or outsource talent when needed. Many entrepreneurs with clear ideas, but minimal computer skills pair with technical co-founders, too. One item left of all the recent coding discussions: Sure, you can teach an entrepreneur how to code. But can you teach a programmer to be an entrepreneur? This is a much more complex talent to learn. If you must have one or the other, entrepreneurial skills still seem much more valuable than fluency in HTML. Is it necessary for entrepreneurs to learn to code? For many of us, barely a day passes without uploading videos, taking photos and editing photos, and sharing digital content in multiple apps. But how well do we understand the technology we use and how digital information is created and manipulated? Given that many careers now involve some form of calculation, it is becoming increasingly urgent for individuals to overcome digital literacy, understand how digital technologies work, and develop literacy in code. This course will help you get it. In this tutorial, you will learn not only the inner workings of your digital world, but also create and manipulate code images, create new artwork and interactive animations. Your pictures and animations will appear in the online Art Gallery, part of the live learning community. Although the origin and accuracy of these documents are dubious in nature, they were used as the basis of a book called Maragtas philipine by author Pedro Monteclaro, originally published in 1907. First published in 1907, Maragtas Pedro Monteclaro is an alleged account of 10 datos or chiefs who fled the oppression of Datu Makatunaw on borneo island. According to the Monteclaro version of the story, these 10 chiefs eventually settled on the island of Panay, where they bought land from Marikudo, the leader of the native Aytas tribe. According to the book, 10 chiefs and their families are ancestors of the entire Visayan population. By the late 1950s, this book had so seed through local culture that it became accepted as history, complete with annual celebration in the form of festival, and inclusion in the annual santo niño holiday in Kalibo, Aklan. On closer inspection - examining the dates, the author's own statements that his source material was written on a paper that did not exist in the Philippines at the beginning of the 13th century, Monteclaro's publisher, Salvador Laguda, even went on the record to renounce the factual nature of the book. Maragtas code as factual history was finally revealed in 1968 by William Henry Scott as his dissertation at the University of Santo Tomas, after hard work examining original texts and searching museums and archives around the world for supporting documents and other historical pre-Hispanic items in the Philippines.
